Since the game was a commercial failure, few ports were released on. The present invention relates to an image transfer assembly, and more particularly to a method and apparatus for the transfer of an image onto a moving web utilizing a heat transfer member. In the use of various different methods for the transfer of images from a lithographic master or stencil to a receiver material, a common approach is to first immerse the master or stencil in a fluid, such as ink, and then apply the master or stencil onto a drum, cylinder, belt or other surface. In printing on a web, the fluid can be applied at various points on the surface of the drum or cylinder while the cylinder or drum is in rotation. In this manner the web will be transferred with an image pattern corresponding to the master or stencil, in a single pass of the surface. Various techniques have been used to cause the fluid to be contained on the surface, and distributed uniformly. Another approach to the transfer of an image pattern is to squeeze or force a transferable liquid substance onto the surface of a receiving material, such as the surface of a cylinder. In this technique, a small amount of transferable liquid, such as an oil or resin, will wet the receiving surface, and the contact pressure between the liquid and the receiving surface will cause the substance to be transferred to the surface. A common application for such a technique is the transfer of ink onto a web of paper, usually in the form of a sheet to be folded and glued. The ink can be forced from a transfer roller, by squeezing or pressing the transfer roller against the web. A web transfer configuration of this type is shown and described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,219,448 to Sparks. In this type of transfer, the transferable liquid is forced onto the surface of the cylinder by an applicator roller, against the surface of a spreader roll, having a tangential pressure applied to the transferable liquid and the web 3da54e8ca3
