The writing on the wall: assessing the damage caused by advertising use of animal models. Do researchers use animals for reasons of beneficial outcomes for themselves or others? Using a best-worst case analysis, I found that the effects of advertising to the public of the use of animals in scientific research are often more harmful than beneficial. My findings are robust across three studies, which collectively involve a survey of 1500 participants, interviews with focus groups, and two longitudinal studies. In the study involving advertisements, I showed that in a hypothetical advertisement, the use of an animal for scientific purposes was accompanied by a negative image and a dislike of the consumer, whereas the use of an inanimate object was accompanied by a positive image and liking. In the study of the extent to which consumers are informed about animal use, I found that media advertising had a smaller impact on consumers' understanding of the use of animals than organizational labelling of animals research. Finally, in the longitudinal study, participants who had been exposed to a prior advertisement reported lower overall perceptions of scientific research, less willingness to contribute, and more willingness to pay for research. The use of animals in advertisements likely causes most harm by creating discomfort with scientific research among the general public; consuming the wrong foods and drink owing to deceptive labelling is, of course, far more likely to cause harm. The results point to a need for more stringent practices in the areas of labelling and advertising.

A Chinese father has been sentenced to life imprisonment for killing his son who was mentally ill and mentally challenged. The unnamed 24-year-old Chinese father has been sentenced to life in prison for the murder of his mentally ill and mentally challenged son, who had been taken to a hospital from a home in Hong Kong for help, because he believed he was possessed by demons, Hong Kong's South China Morning Post reports.
