Egg-laying hen The egg-laying hen is a domesticated fowl. It is one of the most productive of all domestic poultry, laying eggs an average of up to sixty every day and a great amount of every egg. There are about 1,000 recognised species of fowl, of which the domesticated turkeys, ducks, geese and chickens (Gallus gallus domesticus and Gallus gallus domesticus) are the best known. Hens differ from other fowl in that they give easy access to their eggs, keeping them well concealed. All domestic fowl are thought to have been domesticated from the grey junglefowl (G. g. spadiceus) in South and Southeast Asia, although, in some interpretations, the junglefowl may have been domesticated earlier. The egg-laying hen lays all or most of its eggs between May and September, depending on its location and weather conditions. It can lay up to 60 eggs in a 24-hour period. Hens prefer to be with a rooster or a flock of hens but in the wild they would be monogamous, mating only once. Domestic hens that are kept as pets are usually monogamous with no crowing or calling of the rooster, but they, unlike their wild counterparts, will allow the rooster to physically mate with them. Hens are raised for egg production and as meat to provide food. They are also used as pet birds, as caged birds, and as laying hens, to provide eggs. Approximately of egg-laying hens are raised for egg production in the United States, and worldwide. They are the only birds to produce most of their own body weight in eggs per year. Breeds The most common breeds of egg-laying hens are the meat-type hens which lay only brownish eggs, and white eggs that are more nutritious. Brown eggs have a much higher fat content. There is also a "noise" breed of hens, the Copper River Valley chicken, that produce eggs with a brilliant yellow colour and, once cooked, appear almost the same shade as copper. The United States Egg Board classifies egg-laying hens as

"As president, I will tell you I will name a special, high-level envoy of the United States to make sure that we are doing everything we can to protect our citizens and our communities from domestic terrorist attacks," she said at her afternoon rally. "And in fact, we have made a commitment that we're going to do everything we can to make sure that doesn't happen." Clinton said that she met with Attorney General Loretta Lynch at a ceremony in Phoenix last week and that she's had a "positive conversation" about a proposal that would allow the feds to investigate cases where a potential attacker pledged allegiance to ISIS. Lynch announced last week that the FBI would not charge Clinton or her aides over her handling of classified information on her private email server. "I have to tell you I do not agree that anything that was done was inappropriate," Clinton told reporters after her rally. "In fact, I think it was perfectly appropriate."The present invention relates generally to electrical receptacles and, more particularly, to a novel grounding receptacle which makes it possible to safely and easily install a standard receptacle and grounding terminal in a 3-prong socket outlet while retaining the grounding terminal and permanently connecting it to the outlet grounding conductor. It has become common practice to provide grounding terminals in wall or outlet devices, such as cable television connectors or the like, to provide a means of safely and conveniently grounding equipment, etc., which may be brought into contact with ungrounded persons. Such devices typically include a standard electrical receptacle on one side, and a grounding terminal on the other side for connection to the outlet grounding conductor. Most often, the standard receptacle is permanently mounted in the device and an extension of the device is placed within an opening in a wall. The grounding terminal is then
