The correlation between the anatomic site of the tumor and different histological types of squamous cell carcinoma of the oral cavity was evaluated, seeking to identify characteristic morphologic features specific to cancers originating in the different subsites of the oral cavity. Certain histologic subtypes were found to be associated with each anatomic subsite. A negative correlation between the amount of smoking consumed and the odds of developing tumors of the oral cavity was also found. In a model for studying the association between nicotine and oral cancer, the odds ratio associated with smoking one pack of cigarettes daily during a lifetime of continuous smoking was 2.66. In a recent Wall Street Journal article, Ernest L. Lindenauer, CPA, CVA, CFE, suggests that there is a buyer's market for small business owners. When inquired about his article, Mr. Lindenauer would only respond that he is "not discounting the problems that startups will have." While there is no doubt that there is a low supply of owners, I would also make the case that the problems are simply of the owners' making. The WSJ article appears to suggest that the owners are to blame, with the author offering few solutions for the problem, other than to recommend that "the change is simple: Make sure you can handle the stress." First, I would agree that there are owners who struggle to manage the business and achieve desired growth. But there are plenty of owners who are doing just fine, with some that are even very successful. As shown in the Working The (Online)Away blog, B2B businesses are particularly adept at growing after they reach 50,000 in revenues. The failure of owners to make the change and take on the stress comes from a lack of preparation. This is especially true for
