Image caption The largest mammalian hearing organ is the bat's ear High-tech sound detectors are being developed for use in all aspects of civil and military engineering. Researchers at the University of Southampton are already using a form of the technology to locate diseases in bats. Now they are developing artificial ears that can be incorporated into buildings, vehicles and even robots. Named the Bioacoustic Effect, the system takes advantage of the way that bats, dolphins and other marine mammals generate sound, the university said. The ears take the place of a microphone, detecting the ultrasonic sound waves generated by insects such as mosquitoes and locusts. These insects are much smaller than bats and dolphins, but still able to make a sound loud enough to be picked up by the Bioacoustic Effect. Large mammal hearing Although the technology has been used to monitor diseases in mammals such as humans, it is only now being developed for use in other species, said Prof Stuart Simpson from the University of Southampton's Ocean and Earth Sciences department. "The Bioacoustic Effect is a very well documented
