Introduction {#sec1-1} =====

Pyogenic granuloma (PG) is a benign vascular proliferative lesion of the skin. The lesion is caused by an inflammatory process, which usually involves the stratum corneum. Histologically, it is composed of capillary, extravascular proliferation of neutrophils and necrosis of the overlying epidermis.^{[[@ref1]][@ref2]} The term pyogenic granuloma is derived from the fact that a mass of granulation tissue in pyogenic condition caused by a suppurative condition was the original belief about this lesion. It is also called "cicatricial granuloma" because of the constant recurrence despite the removal of the primary lesion. Although this lesion may occur at various sites including the oral mucosa, it is more common in the skin and nose.^{[[@ref1]} The exact pathogenesis of pyogenic granuloma is unknown, although traumatic injury is believed to be a major cause. Chemotactic factors from bacteria and altered keratinocytes may stimulate the accumulation of neutrophils and neutrophil-derived proteases in the inflammatory response and promote subsequent keratinocyte proliferation. Furthermore, in an immune-mediated response, macrophages are believed to be the initiating factor in the formation of the pyogenic granuloma. Pyogenic granuloma is also considered an idiopathic lesion, the etiology of which is still unknown.^{[[@ref3]][@ref4]} Cutaneous pyogenic granuloma may occur at any age, and it is more common in the elderly and females.^{[[@ref2]][@ref5]} Lesions can occur anywhere on the skin. The lesions are mostly painless and usually solitary or as multiple.^{[[@ref4]][@ref5]} The most common location for the pyogenic granuloma is on the gingival or alveolar mucosa. It is most commonly encountered on the lower lip. Clinically, a pyogenic granuloma appears as a dome-shaped or
